Commentary

A sharp drop in the share price of PartyGaming cost the Fund 1.1% in October as legislative changes effectively shut down its business in the United States. Although this was a known risk and was considered when determining the stock's overall reward and risk potential, the negative impact of the risk coming to fruition is no less painful. Given the extent of the change, we formally re-evaluated the investment case, including having a second analyst examine the stock with fresh eyes and convening a second policy group meeting. We came out of this process concluding that PartyGaming is attractive and have not sold the position. Investing is about the intelligent assessment of risks and rewards, and occasions like this serve as a humbling reminder that, however well-considered, risks are ever-present and fully capable of making us look and feel distinctly unintelligent. This is by no means the first, nor will it be the last such experience. As always, we look to intelligent diversification to mitigate these events and to our research process to minimise their occurrence.
