Commentary

The month of October saw a continuation in the dominance of anything related to China. While we continue to be big long-term believers, our fundamentals-driven investment approach has had us shifting from today's high fliers to what has been left behind. Samsung Electronics is the best example. Samsung has clearly been left out of the China euphoria, with flat performance over the past two years versus the 300% gain in Chinese shares and 115% gain in the region. We see tremendous opportunity in Samsung through a combination of its very low 10.5 times 2008 estimated earnings multiple at a time when its significant semiconductor division is dealing with cyclically low prices, and what we see as a very likely continuation of its solid growth performance. Our confidence is bolstered by Samsung's leading focus on research and development, emerging brand name that now rivals Sony, and dominant market share in the commodity memory industry that appears to be consolidating significantly, leading to the increased prospect of more favourable pricing in future.
