Commentary

China has been and continues to represent a fascinating long-term investment opportunity for intrepid investors. From the start of the Fund, in our communications we have tried to strike an appropriate balance between the reward and risk of significant investments in China. China has long had amazing secular economic growth prospects, and a long-term likelihood of moving toward more investor-friendly regulatory and legal systems. And at the Fund's launch, valuations were such that we were able to buy into these long-term positives at incredible discounts to global comparisons, owing to investors' concerns with the risks. These risks are the same as they have been, chiefly that as an emerging economy, volatility should be expected, spurred in part by immature market, legal, and regulatory systems. While slow progress has been made in these areas, we caution that current investor enthusiasm for China has pushed valuations to levels that indicate a degree of comfort with these risks more befitting the world's more advanced markets.
