Commentary

While the absolute performance of both the Japanese stockmarket and the Orbis Japan Equity Fund continue to be negative for the year to date, the Fund did significantly outperform the benchmark TOPIX in October, regaining substantially all of the relative underperformance suffered in the 3rd quarter. Our analysis of the fundamentals of individual companies points to the coming of the end of the trend of strong outperformance by cyclical shares exposed to the strong growth currently experienced by the BRIC (Brazil, Russia, India, and China) economies. As we have discussed in some depth in the past, the Fund is now almost completely devoid of these names and hence stands to benefit, at least in a relative sense, from those shares coming back to earth. Likewise, however, it is also possible that "this time it really is different" or that this current cycle has much further to go. In either case, the Fund could continue to suffer for some time but we would rather be positioned in line with long-term fundamentals than run the risk of being left without a chair when the music stops.
