PORTFOLIO

Commentary

Your Fund's top ten holdings include two unusual bedfellows: Gilead Sciences and Gazprom. The former is a US biopharmaceutical company whose shares are trading near an all-time high, while the latter is a deeply out-of-favour Russian gas producer. How can both be consistent with our investment approach? The common thread is that both shares trade below our assessment of what they are worth based on long-term fundamentals. Whereas Gazprom is undoubtedly contrarian, we would also argue that our thesis was based on a "contrarian" view on Gilead. The discount to Gilead's intrinsic value arose not because the share price was depressed by market pessimism, but because our estimate of the company's value far exceeded the market's assessment. We may yet be proven wrong on either Gilead or Gazprom (or both!) but we believe that being opportunistic and having the freedom to consider both types of investments—rather than being constrained to rigid definitions of "value" or "growth"—is a compelling advantage inherent in our investment philosophy.
