Commentary

Against the backdrop of market concerns about future Chinese economic growth and the uncertainty around commodity supply chains, it is not surprising that many stocks exposed to these factors have suffered. It can perhaps be expected that when an entire segment of the market falls, some good quality stocks will be unfairly punished. Among these, we believe, are Noble Group and Olam International which are both commodity trading houses, but are two quite different businesses. Noble has a large presence in "hard" bulk commodities such as metals and coal, while Olam focuses on niche agricultural commodities such as edible nuts, spices and beverages. We think both of these companies will benefit as demand from emerging markets for certain types of commodities continues to grow, driven by consumption from large populations. While we can't be certain when the stockmarket will recognise the value that we see, we are confident that shareholders will be rewarded in the long term if these companies can deliver the strong fundamental results that they have in the past.
