Commentary

Your Fund’s investments in China include very little exposure to the large state owned enterprises (SOEs) that dominate the local index. Although those shares trade at quite undemanding valuation multiples relative to local and regional markets, we generally do not believe their share prices are well below long-term intrinsic value. Many SOEs offer limited transparency to investors, and management’s incentives are often misaligned with those of shareholders. As such, within China we have found greater opportunity in more entrepreneurial and simpler-to-understand businesses with favourable exposures to long-term trends. Examples include internet-based companies and New Oriental Education & Technology, China’s largest private education provider, which specialises in English training and test preparation and offers tutoring across all subjects. We believe that the market’s fear that online education will erode its profitability is overblown. Despite New Oriental’s strong brand recognition in China, where a growing middle class is driving rising demand for private education services, its stock trades at a significant discount to private education companies elsewhere. Accordingly, we think the stock offers a favourable balance of risk and return over our long-term investment horizon.
