Commentary

To pursue its mandate, Global Balanced has several tools at its disposal. An important tool that tends not to get much discussion time is the Fund's currency risk management. Currency movements can have a pronounced effect on a global investor's returns, so our primary aim is to reduce the risk of a permanent loss in purchasing power. As with other assets, we believe it is possible to analyse the fundamentals of a currency and determine whether it is over- or undervalued. We then apply this research with a focus on reducing exposure to those that appear to be poor stores of value. For example, this year we have reduced your Fund's exposure to the euro from 19% to 7%, while increasing the US dollar exposure from 44% to 61%. In our view, current exchange rates do not adequately reflect the euro's vulnerability to monetary easing, resurgent Japanese exports, and continued unrest in Ukraine. While we do not seek to capture short-term currency movements, we believe it is important to manage the Fund's exposure to preserve your long-term purchasing power.
