Commentary

Last year, we were hopeful that Japan's new political leadership would help to improve the nation's economic prospects. But so far, the Democratic Party of Japan (DPJ) has been a disappointment to both voters and markets. The party's first prime minister failed to deliver on promises, and resigned. Although his replacement pledges to curb sovereign debt, voters are unhappy, and the DPJ recently lost control of Japan's Upper House. While the country struggles with its political leadership, its economic leadership struggles with deflation. We share your frustration that the Japanese stock market has once again underperformed its global peers, but we note that expectations are now very low, particularly for stocks exposed to the domestic economy. This leaves us enthusiastic about your Fund's prospects in the long term.
