Commentary

For the last several months and for the first time since 2003, the Global Equity Fund has not been overweight the Japanese yen. In our view, the yen is no longer a superior store of value relative to other major currencies. But this does not alter our preference for domestically-orientated Japanese stocks over exporters in your Fund. As always, our stockpicking decisions are driven by bottom-up views on individual companies. Although exporters clearly benefit from a weaker yen, we simply continue to find more attractive opportunities among companies with heavy exposure to the domestic economy. The prevailing sentiment among investors is that Japanese exporters have brighter prospects than domestically-oriented companies, but we see many attractively valued local companies with strong positions in niche markets, sustainable competitive advantages and growth prospects. These companies—including Rakuten and Sundrug—are among the largest positions in your Fund.
