Commentary

Sentiment in Japan is as depressed as we have ever seen. The 11 March earthquake has weighed on the short-term outlook while sovereign debt, political gridlock and deflation have dulled the market's long-term prospects. But many Japanese companies have thrived over the past two "lost decades" despite the tough environment. Many of your Fund's holdings have been largely unaffected by the earthquake, and some are even poised to benefit from policies prompted by the disaster. One example is INPEX, Japan's largest oil and natural gas company. Following a heavily dilutive $6 billion share issue last year, investors punished the stock, pushing the company's enterprise value to a level equivalent to the value of just its proved reserves. Most global oil companies trade at 2-3 times the value of their proved reserves. Further, we believe long-term growth opportunities such as Ichthys – INPEX's massive liquefied natural gas (LNG) project off northwest Australia – are not nearly fully reflected in the share price.
